thought of getting into property development. I love property; I like everything about it, and I've done fairly well buying and selling my own houses.

I made good friends with some of the big property developers when I got married in St Kitts, and they are turning the whole island inside out. They are doing phenomenal things. St Kitts is competing for foreign investment and tourism with the other islands, Barbados, Antigua and Jamaica, and they want to attract and accommodate the big cruise liners. These developers are busy upgrading all the hotels on the island, as well as building new ones. There's a lot of commercial development too, and they have told me that I'm welcome to come and join them.

So that could be an option, but I haven't made up my mind yet on what I really want to do. And it's not like I'm the only one in this dilemma either. It's tough for professional sportspeople to find something that they can tackle with the same degree of passion that they put into their sport. Cricket was such a massive part of my life for so long that it's going to be difficult finding something to replace it.

Even someone like Shaun Pollock has found it tough adapting to life after sport. I mean, Polly is one of the most together people I have ever met, and he had no idea what he wanted to do when he retired. All he said when I asked him was, 'I don't know. I'll just take a bit of time off and decide.' As far as I can tell, he's doing a bit of commentating, some public speaking – he's a really good speaker – and some charity work. I haven't heard of him being involved in any business ventures, for example.

I don't think I'll miss being in the public eye too much. I certainly have enjoyed my time on centre stage but, in these closing stages of my career, I have got used to the spotlight falling on the younger guys. This is something I have accepted. I've had my time. I've been in the business for 20 years now. I have signed all the autographs, posed for all the photographs, done all the newspaper articles, magazine covers and features, and been on all the TV shows. Often enough I've been in the press for reasons I'd rather not have been, and I'll be happy to see that quieten down. Although, having said that, one has to take responsibility for one's actions and, for me, part of that was to accept that the press were going to have a field day with some of my indiscretions.

If I look ahead to the next 20 years, I'd like to see myself living in Cape Town in the home in Camps Bay I have just bought. I love this city and the
