in Hyderabad. Before the game, during the team talk, I spoke up (something I'm doing more often now at the Cobras) and basically said, 'Listen, this is not the time for you to retreat into your shell. It's a one-off opportunity. You are going to be playing in front of crowds of 30 000 or 40 000 people – something that will never happen back home. And there are billions of people who will be watching you on TV. This is no time to freeze up. Don't withdraw into your shell.'

Being on TV is nothing – I mean, we are all pros; we've been on telly plenty of times. That shouldn't be an issue. And we're also used to crowds (although it's a different story in India, but still). But the pressure still got to some key players. Guys who had been playing for eight or ten years were suddenly dropping catches … just because they were in a semi-final. We scored a respectable 175, with JP Duminy getting 61, and I anchored our innings with 42 up front. Unfortunately, those dropped catches cost us, and Daren Ganga and Dwayne Bravo won the game for Trinidad and Tobago.

It might be something I was born with, but I've never frozen in the big games. As I've said, perhaps it's because there's more glory in those games. Or perhaps it's because I have been playing the game in my mind in the days leading up to it, and when I actually get onto the pitch I've 'been there' already.

I really don't know …
