We could hear music blasting out from one bar we walked past – they were having a karaoke evening, and it looked like a whole lot of fun. So Jonathan and I went in. Right then and there I decided it was time to fulfil a personal fantasy of mine, and that was to belt out Neil Diamond's 'Sweet Caroline' on stage. Needless to say, we were fairly intoxicated. I'm not right now, and in case you're wondering, I'm still not embarrassed by my love for Neil Diamond. My musical taste also includes the great Engelbert Humperdinck. Anyone who embarks on a musical career with a name and a pair of sideburns like his must have both an abundance of talent and a sizeable pair of balls.

At the bar, Jonathan and I see these five English cricket fans, also well juiced, and obviously drowning their sorrows, because England had just been given an absolute drilling by the Proteas. They recognised me and we had a few toots together, and it was then that we all decided, no, bugger this, all six of us are hitting the stage for a rousing sing-a-long. They asked me what I wanted to sing, and I said, 'Sweet Caroline'.

'Great fookin' choice!' was the unanimous response. We gave it the full kitchen sink. I've never sung so loudly in all my life as I sang with those guys. And I didn't even know them from Adam.

There I was, with a mate's son, in Barbados, singing with a bunch of Poms I'd met minutes before, and I was having an absolute blast. It was one of the best nights I've had, and with total strangers too. That's me, I guess. I can happily chat to anyone, be it the tea lady at Province, the CEO of a big corporate or a complete stranger, and genuinely enjoy the company. I've always been like that, and it is something of which I'm quite proud. Irrespective of the success I've had, and despite all my experiences, I've always remained true to myself.

As I recall, Jonathan and I even managed to pick up two women that night, and we went back to his dad's apartment to bring the whole evening … and indeed this chapter … to a fitting climax.
