I’m happy and calm, but I’ve still got a lot of energy, you know, and that combines into a person I’m still getting to know. My dad always worried that if I gave up alcohol altogether, I’d become boring and lose my sense of humour. But that has not been the case. For one, my personality isn’t based on my alcohol consumption; and, two, although I still have that energy, I also have a different mindset now. I’m a little more reflective and I’m quieter.

I do a lot of thinking in hotel rooms when I’m on tour (not so much at the ground, because there’s just no time to think about anything else but the game, really) or at home between games.

Whereas before I’d always want to go out on the town, I actually enjoy this time now. In these quiet hours I find myself contemplating all the things that I’ve done in my life and what direction I want my life to take now.

I’m in a good space.
