the name of Ricky Skerritt – had awarded me a free 10-day holiday on the island, which included accommodation. Tenielle was obviously cool with that.

The wedding was a small ceremony attended by only a couple of mates whom I had met on the island during the World Cup and took place at a resort called the Rawlins Plantation Inn, which was basically an old sugar plantation that had been converted into a hotel. The hotel kindly organised the whole event for us, including the priest. It was great. Very romantic.

I don't have one photograph of the wedding, though. But that's typical of me. I never keep any snapshots. I've got some of my son Rashard, but otherwise I never keep photos.

Tenielle looked gorgeous. Man oh man, absolutely divine. But as I was standing there, taking my vows, I was asking myself whether I was doing the right thing. Right there, as I was speaking the words, a thought just suddenly dawned on me. I remember thinking, 'I hope you realise what you're getting into.'

The marriage lasted for about a year.

Divorce

The actual year itself wasn't too bad. I was away for the majority of the time – six months in all – so I basically only saw Tenielle for half the year we were married. Apart from one occasion during our engagement, I wasn't unfaithful during the marriage. Well, not technically, anyway.

Tenielle and I had a lot of great times, make no mistake, and I loved – and still love – her. But there were also some very bad times. Most of which were my fault.

One such time was at my cousin's wedding. I got really pissed, and on the way home Tenielle and I had a massive fight. She kept shouting at me that I was driving too fast, and I was getting really annoyed, as you do when you're drunk. She kept on at me, though, on and on: 'You're driving too fast … you're driving too fast.'

We were physically fighting while I was driving. I was trying to prevent her from grabbing the steering wheel and hitting me … and in the process I managed to pull some of her hair out. She was just trying to get me to stop the car, but I was having none of it. It's one of the effects alcohol has on me: I'm a bladdy stubborn drunk. Only when I'm on spirits, though. If I drink wine, I'm the most peaceful drunk around.
