But God has promised

Strength for the day,

Rest for the labour

Light for the way.

It has been my observation that most Indians suffer unnecessary misery al their lives because they do not know how to manage their emotions. They are paralysed by some sort of a psychological inertia. Phrases like ‘the next best alternative’, ‘the only feasible option or solution’, and ‘til things take a turn for the better’ are commonplace in our business conversations. Why not write about the deep-rooted character traits which manifest themselves in such widespread, selfdefeatist thought patterns and negative behaviour? I have worked with many people and organizations and have had to deal with people who were so ful of their own limitations that they had no other way to prove their self-worth than by intimidating me. Why not write about the victimization which is a hal mark of the tragedy of Indian science and technology? And about the pathways to organizational success? Let the latent fire in the heart of every Indian acquire wings, and the glory of this great country light up the sky.
